A BATTLE ROYAL.

A Mountain Lion and a Cinnamon Bear in

Two brothers, old prospectors and hunters, who had been in the hills for years and had seen many strange and startling sights, report having seen one of the most thrilling and desperate fights they have ever witnessed.

They were camping in a canyon that comes into the main San Antonio canyon from the west, about one and one-half miles below the miners' camp. Ther had been out during the day prospect-ing on the south slope of Baldy and had started for camp near sundown, when they killed a deer, which delayed them till dark. They hung the deer in a tree rather than pack it to camp over the rocks is the dark, the place where they left the deer being only a short distance from camp, in the west fork of the canvon.

They had hardly rolled themselves in their blankets when they heard an unearthly roar and scream, quickly followed by other roars and screams, as though a whole menagerie of wild beasts had been turned loose. It took them but a few moments to determine the cause of the disturbance. dressing quickly and taking their rifles they started to see the fun. By crossing the canyon in which they were camped they got to a point from which they could command a view of quite a piece of the western canvon.

When they gained the top of the point they saw just below them, not one hundred yards away, what had caused the noise. They could see the tree where they had hung their deer, and just beneath the tree they saw the deer and two other animals, a monster California lion and an immense cinnamon bear. They had smelled out the deer and had come for a feast, each little expecting the other; but there they were, fighting over the carcass to see which was to be master of the situation. the situation.

Their roaring and screaming awoke a housand echoes in the canyon, which made the fight seem more dreadful still. It was a fight to the death. Strug-gling and rolling, biting and chewing, scratching and screaming did the mor sters fight, only breaking away from one another long enough, seemingly, to regain their breath and strength, when at it they would go again with roar and scream. Thus they fought for over an hour, when, torn, bleeding, and completely exhausted, evidently dying, they rolled apart, only to lie and snarl at each other, unable from their terrible exertions to do more. But there were near worse enemies to them than they were to each other.

Quietly the two brothers, knowing there was nothing to fear from the two exhausted champions, leveled their rifles, and after five shots had bee fired the two mighty brutes had cease their struggle, having gained what each had tried to do for the other, for the two fighters of Old Baldy lay dead. There lay a California lion that meas ured eight feet four inches from tip of nose to tip of tail, a king of his race. The bear, a cinnamon, was a monster of his species. As mar as they could estimate he would have weighed one thousand pounds.—Ontario Observer.
